The work which has been going on regarding the minds of men suggests that one fifth of a second is about a limit for most of us in the matter of the useful division of time in our minds. But one fifth of a second. Short as it may seem, is a very long time indeed when it is considered in relation to a piece of time measuring only a thousandth millionth of a second. It is those same heavy going minds of men that have made the machines which are so quick, and it is men who have to tell the machines what to do. Without men to help them the machines can do nothing and are quite worthless.

All the many and wonderful manufacture things in the world today come from the minds of the men. They do not make themselves; and it is very strange indeed to that men can manufacture machines which then do in work and carry out certain action better than himself. Man is a thinking being, and he has always directing much of his thought towards making things which would save him from hard labour.
