The focus of development planning is on transforming the rural areas keeping the social, economic, technological and cultural horizons in mind. Therefore, the primary characteristic of any plan must have consistency among the planning exercises undertaken at different levels.

This means that a plan undertaken at one level should be in harmony with exercises undertaken at other levels. This does not, however, mean that a district plan, for instance is the facsimile of the state plan, on a smaller scale. The plan at lower levels should have the freedom to choose among national objectives.

Depending on the feasibility or relevance of the national objectives to the blocks, a plan may or may not correspond or give the same weight age to national plan objectives. For instance, the national plan objective of self-reliance translated at the block level would imply that outflow of goods and services from the block to the rest of the country increase to a level at which these can pay for the inflow of goods and service. Since the block is a part, even if a small part, of the national economy, self-reliance in this sense is not feasible, if not altogether irrelevant. Since the specific situation at the local level is quite different from the national scene, a block plan may even different weight age to national priorities.
